The findings may help explain certain trends in society: the apparent mistrust of outsiders, the increase in social isolation and the preference for small and tighter circles. While it is not new that people treat others according to their relationship-status – a behaviour pattern that is generally called “in-group favoritism” – the sociologists’ findings go one step further. They found that there is a special circle of acquaintance that is usually closed to outsiders. In the form of a circle of familiarity, this core group “closes the social space” for others, and makes them feel somewhat left out. The researchers, Prof. Li and Dr. Judith van den Berg, used data from 739 Facebook groups from the US, where they found a correlation between the amount of “cliquey-friendliness” and feelings of social isolation and low self-esteem. “It also made us wonder why 1cb139a0ed
